Loops in Java is a feature used to execute a particular part of the program repeatedly if a given condition evaluates to be true. While all three types' basic functionality remains the same, there's a vast difference in the syntax and how they operate. In this article, you will focus on for loop in Java. But before delving deep into for loop and how to use it, let's understand the difference between the three types of loops. There are several differences among the three types of loops in Java, such as the syntax, optimal time to use, condition checking, and so on. The table below represents some of the primary dissimilarities between all the loops in Java. Introduction For loop in Java iterates a given set of statements multiple times. The Java while loop executes a set of instructions until a boolean condition is met. The do-while loop executes a set of statements at least once, even if the condition is not met. After the first execution, it repeats the iteration until the boolean condition is met. Best time to use Use it when you know the exact number of times to execute the part of the program. Use it when you don't know how many times you want the iteration to repeat. Use it when you don't know how many times you want the iteration to repeat, but it should execute at least one time. Syntax for(init; condition; incr/dcr){ //statements to be repeated } while(condition){ //statements to be repeated } do{ //statements to be repeated }while(condition); Example for(int x=0; x
